Homocysteine is formed in the body by the demethylation of methionine. If this process is not properly controlled, homocysteine levels can become very high. Elevated levels of homocysteine have been related to cardiovascular disease and several other diseases, including depression. An association between homocysteine and depression can be found in some, but not all studies. The role of homocysteine in depression is an intriguing one. If elevation of homocysteine is related to depression, and depression is associated with cardiovascular disease, it is possible that elevated homocysteine is somehow related to the development of this disease. Although homocysteine is the most important product of the methionine cycle, the amino acid cysteine is also found in high concentrations in the body. Cysteine is involved in the synthesis of glutathione and other antioxidants, and in one study, it was suggested that increased intake of cysteine may prevent or even treat depression. The homocysteine hypothesis of depression may be related to a systemic disease, such
